

- Home
- About
- Species
- Images
- Conservation

Butterflies and moths may be tiny but to save them you have to think big.

Colonies of butterflies surviving in small isolated pockets of land are vulnerable. Research has shown that they can be encouraged to spread their wings and expand but only if they don't have to fly too far.

In response to this new way of understanding butterfly populations and movement, our work to protect them and their habitat takes a landscape-scale approach.

Conservation on a landscape-scale means creating chains of butterfly habitat across large areas of countryside. Improving and connecting land for wildlife through the coordinated conservation management of numerous sites for a range of species across a large natural area.

In the last decade, Butterfly Conservation and our partners have embarked on some of the biggest butterfly projects to date.

Join us

Butterflies and moths are among the most threatened groups of wildlife in the UK. Without your support we cannot continue our vital work to protect them.

Donate

Every penny counts in the struggle to preserve habitats in the UK for our native species. Help make our conservation work happen by making a donation yourself or in memory of someone special.

Gardening

Want do to something on your own patch? Gardening is a great way to help butterflies and moths.

Get involved

From baking at home to volunteering on our reserves there are lots of ways you can help save butterflies and moths.

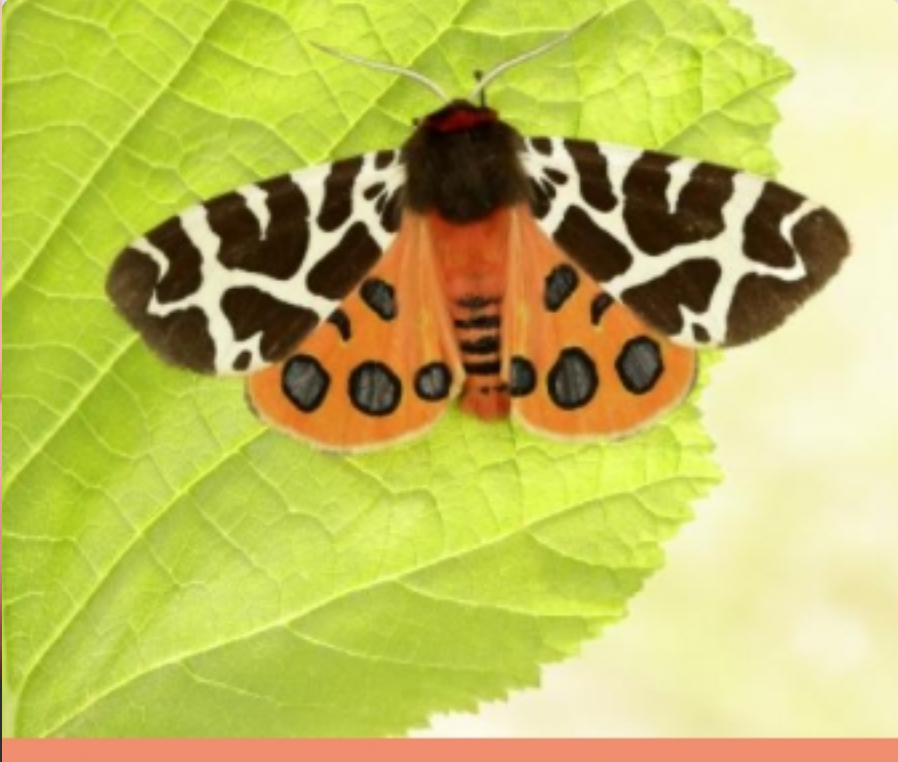

Recording

The data gathered in our world-renowned schemes is used by the Government to indicate the health of the environment.

Education

By sharing our knowledge and enthusiasm for butterflies and moths we hope to inspire a new generation of naturalists, volunteers and conservationists.

How we use your donations

Every penny and pound you donate to us helps towards our conservation work, but what exactly do we do with it?

Conservation

In the last five years, Butterfly Conservation has embarked on some of the biggest butterfly projects to date. Find out more about our work.

Reserves

Butterfly Conservation currently has over 30 Nature Reserves all over the United Kingdom - all havens for butterflies and moths.

Shop

Shop til you drop for butterflies and moths – every sales raises funds for our conservation work.

Fund our work

Find out more about our current supporters and discover ways you and your organisation might be able to help save butterflies, moths and our environment.

Recording

Monitoring programmes help us direct our conservation effort where it is needed but we need your help.

Leave a gift in your will

Leave Butterfly Conservation a gift in your Will and help to ensure that butterflies and moths thrive for future generations to enjoy.